The Opal Fields of New South Wales

Australia's National Stone.

In the Australian Court of the Panama Pacific Exposition in San Francisco of 1915, the exhibit around which large crowds clustered every day was a magnificent collection of black opal from Lightning Ridge, New South Wales.

The Australian Court was admittedly a highly creditable portion of the Exposition, and the picturesque arrangement of exhibits representing the industries and productions of the vast continent across the sea elicited admiration and amazement from hundreds of thousands of visitors, but nothing so drew and fascinated the multitude as the collection of precious stones, which was New South Wales' proud offering.

In that collection opal was shown in every stage of its history—in the rough stone just as it was taken from the ground; partly polished, but uncut; cut and polished to its highest state of excellence and fashioned into rings, necklets, faces of watches, carvings and a hundred other articles of jewelry designed by an artist hand with infinite skill.

It is not strange that the natural opal, untouched by the jeweler's art, evoked admiration, for in that repository there were slabs of stone whose splashes of fiery color resembled sunset skies of crimson and gold, and others that took on the form of blue lakes banked by fire clad mountain peaks; of bush fire scenes and silver landscapes; of peacocks' tails and Corot fans, and many another miniature masterpiece painted by the hand of the Great Artificer.

The Americans had never seen such opals before, and at once a craze set in for the mysterious stone. Fabulous prices were offered for the rarest pieces, and the whole of the exhibit realized a price undreamt of, even by the exhibitor, an opal specialist in Sydney and a man not easily amazed.

The black opal became the fashion, not only on account of its rare and wondrous beauty, but because it is supposed to bring its owner good fortune and happiness, and to this day

Australian women, who love their national stone, blame Americans for running up its price and for keeping it soaring higher and higher into the realms of millionaire gems.

The opal fields of New South Wales are widely distributed, but naturally the finest specimens of black opal are rare. White opal is chiefly found at White Cliffs, some 650 miles northwest from Sydney, and the home of the black variety is at Lightning Ridge, near Walgett, 500 miles from Sydney. Mining is going on in both localities, but the latter is the more important and newer field.

The romance of the opal field has yet to be written, but the scientist tells us interesting things about the formation of the opaline stone. It is found in the upper cretaceous sandstone, which is silicified, in the widespread productions of quartzite and common opal, the precious opal being an occasional concomitant, like the pearl in the oyster shell, and is probably formed by a general uprise of silicified water under pressure.

On the fields have been found remarkable replacements of fossil organisms by precious opal, with the frequent production of objects of great beauty. In this way molluscs, crinoids, belemnites, fossil wood and reptilian bones have been opalized, and many of these unique specimens have been secured for museums overseas.

Opal seeking has a fascination unknown to other mining operations, as it affords opportunities for unskilled labor, there being no known surface indications, and the finds are at no great distance from the surface, frequently not more than a few feet, and generally less than eighty feet, and owing to the ease with which it can be removed from the field opal mining has irresistible attractions for the fortune seeker.

Vast sums of money have been realized on the fields in the past. Recent records give the figures £1,892,637 as having been taken from the opal mines of New South Wales, and their future gives promise of boundless wealth for the taking.

Fewer Blisters

NO tire is blister-proof. If the tread is cut and left unrepaired, so that dirt and sand can force their way into and under it, any tire will blister.

But it is possible to make a tire tread so tough that it resists sharp edges remarkably. And it is possible to vulcanize and cure a tire so carefully that separation of tread from carcass rarely occurs.

Both of these possibilities have been realized in HORSE-SHOE TIRES. They seldom blister.

Those who know tires will see in this feature another reason why it pays to
